

and Jimmy Cudaback, we don't want to make it appear that we're pitting the (inaudible) intellectual snobs against just plain old Nebraskans here on the floor and that really does kind of bother me. It really does. For example, it's not you but, you know, I was just curious if we had one of these laptops, couldn't Senator Maurstad go out and while he's on the golf course participate in the Legislature? You know, why be here in person? In fact, why should we have to be on the floor at all with all this technology? Why shouldn't we be able to be wherever we want to be and have this laptop operation so we can all keep up to date including when somebody like David Bernard-Stevens writes out 20 amendments and they're immediately as soon as he writes them on his desk, they're in the machine and we got them in our laptop and we know exactly what's going on and we can vote intelligently? Is that going to happen? I don't know. I tell you what I'd like to know is what's going on with some of the conversations in some of the senators' offices with some of their staff. Now that would be interesting information. But you know that's not going to happen, is it? What kind of information are we talking about? I have such a terrible feeling at this point in time about this whole kind of processing system. I hate to see us get cranked into defending the need to be modern and modernized when, in fact, there is some concern on the part of a lot of us that we need to do this and I'll remind you that you can do amazing things without these machines. I'd remind you again, back in Japan they pay all their hospital and doctor bills with paper. They don't have electronic machines at all to do that. I think it's what you set your heart and mind to do. What I can see happening, I can really see happening is some day a bunch of robots sitting on this floor, no bodies, no warm bodies that people can call. It's almost like we're getting back to the friendly banker again rather than that unfriendly computer system down in Georgia you can talk to when you've got a problem with your account. I can see that happening. I can honestly see that happening. I don't know how far you take this. I don't know how much you have to spend to realize it's maybe necessary or not. I don't know what kind of information you would need immediately unless it were the written amendments that you don't get published, unless you want to change the rules and say that no amendment can be offered unless it's been published so it can get in the machine that is sitting on your lap at least a day or two before that. How does somebody enter information in the machine? If I had a laptop, could I put it, if I'm writing all those amendments, in
